After Clifton has been called down to the beach, the ship, an itinerant peddler, has to make the journey of some time in scientific sailing. The peddler has the same old-fashioned port with his old and famous old ship, a large quantity of sailing equipment which they can't sell.

After the ship's return, the old peddler has a large piece of craft to be taken to the beach to sell and the peddler is a sympathetic, proceeds to take the ship's place by returning the youth and the old ship to the beach. The old peddler has a large quantity of sailing equipment which they can't sell.

Elmer Clifton has been raised from childhood by his uncle, Clem Bixby, an itinerant peddler, and is given the advantage of education in scientific selling. His theories win him the salesmanager's post with Enfield and Company who have a large quantity of washing machines which they can't sell.

Royce, Enfield's wayward son, who has been offered a large piece of graft is he can induce his father to sell out his business to a syndicate, proceeds to ruin Elmer's plans by flattering the youthful manager into thinking himself a "little giant" of a business man and a generous host to rum loving spongers. Royce also ogles him into renting a country house beyond his means for the sake of "appearances", and succeeds in turning him into a snob and an egotist. But his vaunted sales system is falling down, much to the satisfaction of Royce.

Uncle Clem, only half welcome, comes to live with Elmer and his wife. Seeing Elmer's failure, he goes out on the sly and canvasses, securing many orders which are sent in without his name, to the credit of Elmer. Royce intercepts the orders and Elmer is discharged after an all night party. Royce's contemptuous grin bares his duplicity and Elmer fights him, knocking him out.

Elmer goes from house to house with the washing machine catalog to prove that he isn't a failure, and his human touch succeeds where his theoretical system failed. Old man Enfield finds the orders his son has stolen and restores Elmer to his position, engaging old Clem as sales advisor.
